THEMES FOR LABOR DAY

1958
With this new issue we bring a new cover with a new concept and NEW PERSPECTIVES IN FAITH AND FREEDOM. The cover is meant to tell a story, an important story, its theme the Cross over the world. For Spiritual Mobilization is Christian in origin, orientation, and purpose—not narrowly, but in the most fundamental, most prophetic sense of the word. For us the Cross is the symbol of conscience, the sign that stands for both judgment and redemption.

And yet, not just a conventional Cross. In the upright and the cross-bar are further symbols. The sturdy, wooden upright is the sign of stability, of eternal verities, of conserved and conserving principles—"The Old Rugged Cross" of enduring faith "towering o'er the wrecks of time." In the sweeping jet-stream of the cross-bar is the sign of the ancient and enduring made contemporary, acknowledging the new needs, challenges, and insights of the dawning space-age. We need both perspectives, the old and the new, the eternal and the temporal, the spiritual and the scientific, the fruits of faith and the flower of reason.

And this cross stands over America to judge and redeem. It is not rooted in America, for it has universal meanings, brooding also over the world, calling all nations to the upward look. Nevertheless, America is our concern, not narrowly or provincially, but as our home, the beloved land we live in, the hearth upon which we stoke or stifle the fires of justice and freedom. What happens here will determine whether, indeed, America is to be "the last, best hope of earth." What happens here, hence the hope of the world, rests upon a faith whose fruit is freedom under God.

Perspective on Faith and Freedom

James C. Ingebretsen
President of Spiritual Mobilization

Our society faces many grave dangers, both from within and without, stemming from our own materialism and inner weaknesses quite as much as from the aggressive international conspiracy which challenges the whole Western tradition. Spiritual Mobilization, through the pages of its journal, Faith and Freedom, and otherwise, has sought to apply to our economic and political problems the conviction that eternal verities and principles, proclaimed by the Founder of Christianity and by the founders of the American Republic, must guide the course of our institutions and government if these are to endure.

We are dedicated to the concept of a society of free men living in spiritual communion with one another and producing the means of livelihood through voluntary cooperation and competition under a system of free markets, private property, and limited government. We continue to believe that freedom in all areas of human life, despite the risks and hardships that inhere in freedom -- indeed, because they inhere in freedom -- is a necessary condition for realizing all other values, both material and spiritual.

Only as free men can individuals wholly fulfill their destinies as children of God. No man and no society can be brought into the Kingdom of God by coercion -- not even when labeled as "social welfare." It is this erroneous belief in coercion labeled as "social welfare" that has won the allegiance of devout and sincere religious leaders to what has been called the "Social Gospel." We repeat the long-time thesis of all libertarianism, that the only religiously justifiable use of force is to protect individuals from the exercise of coercion by other individuals or groups.

The Internal Danger

Today, this freedom principle is being violated to a considerable extent by organized labor. Organized labor unions, we feel, have largely ceased to be a means of protecting the rights and promoting the real interests of individuals or of the community; many have become the means of exploitation and oppression. And it is upon all of us, as consumers and citizens, that the burden of this exploitation is now coming to rest.

That is why, in this issue and several to follow, we are focusing our attention and concern upon the moral problems presented by the growth and abuse of organized coercive power in the labor union movement. We see this as a primary internal threat to our entire society, perhaps as the major medium through which collective regimentation will come increasingly to dominate the lives of all of us. The coercions of communism as such, known and labeled, are not to be feared more than the disguised adaptations which thrive under the moral sanctions and spiritual blindness of a generation that either accepts or fails to discern and challenge them.
The Richberg Challenge

The time has come when we must awaken to what Mr. Donald Richberg describes in his new book as "a clear and present danger"; (1)

"Americans are more out-of-date and ill-informed concerning the realities of the labor movement in the United States than they are in any other area of public interest. Fifty years ago, the picture of a labor union as a weak, idealistic organization of downtrodden workers struggling against an oppressive concentration of property power was often accurate. Any such picture of an established union today is not merely ridiculous; it is willfully or ignorantly untruthful ....

"Instead of being a movement of workers banded together for the protection and advancement of their legitimate interests in a free economy, the labor movement has now become a political movement with the objective of establishing a socialist labor government in control of the economic and social life of the nation ....

"It is natural that union propaganda still portrays the unions as weak, defensive organizations of helpless wage earners who are forced to wage a continuing struggle against the ever-threatening oppression of great aggregations of heartless capital. As a matter of fact, the unions are powerful, aggressive organizations that are engaged in a continuing warfare against the maintenance of a free competitive economy. Unless this civil warfare is stopped and peaceful competition is substituted for monopolistic coercion in labor relations, a socialized economy and a socialist labor government are inevitable. This, unhappily, is not a remote prospect but one that is rapidly developing."

Thus, with this Labor Day issue of Faith and Freedom, we initiate an effort in depth to put under the sharp light of moral and spiritual scrutiny the policies and practices which have produced this threat to our free institutions.

A New Approach

We have been led to undertake this effort by the responses to a questionnaire carried in this journal some time ago, and by ensuing correspondence and conversations with thoughtful friends across the country, as well as by the ideas developed in several conferences on "Leadership in Today's World" and "Work in Today's World." These have provided the framework for the course which lies ahead and about which we will be writing in more detail in subsequent issues.

But we are not limiting ourselves to the labor problem alone. In the course of time we expect to be as comprehensive as possible within the scope of our declared faith, "Faith For Our Freedom," which appears inside the front cover. Though we believe it necessary to come to grips with the abuses of union power, we feel that, among other things, it is also necessary to test business and other leadership to try to discover the failures which permitted the union abuses to develop. We must try to formulate an application of moral standards which will lead to the sort of creative work relationships within which such naked power as we now confront can neither gain nor keep a foothold.

The New Editor

This is our new approach under the new editor, the Rev. Edward W. Greenfield, former pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton, Indiana, who has also had several years' experience as a college teacher and a factory worker.

Yet the new Faith and Freedom is not really new. The first issue of this magazine was published in December, 1949. What was said then to the first editor, William Johnson, is appropriately said now:

'We want to publish a magazine which will interest some of the most influential persons in America -- the ministers.

'We know that there are countless questions unanswered about individual liberty. Furthermore, we believe that many of the answers are to be found in the spiritual area; many hinge upon the answer to a sincere question: 'What is the nature and destiny of man?'

"We want a magazine which will serve the ministers who will shape the answers to these questions, a magazine which will stimulate them, a magazine which will challenge them, a magazine which will earn a place in their busy schedules.

"Remember, above all else, that freedom must be understood before it is won.
Remember Lincoln's words: 'The world has never had a good definition of liberty, and the American people, just now, are much in want of one.'"

The Unchanging Faith
So the basic philosophy that governs Faith and Freedom remains as it has been.
The editor is new, and he will have his own way of influencing the character and quality of the journal. The cover and format are changed, and, rather than be a catchall for a variety of subjects, including narrations and dramatizations, the contents of each issue will be more in the form of essays exploring in depth a single theme. Our new editor believes that searching thought on crucial issues has its own drama for people who think -- clergymen as well as thought-leaders in all walks of life who are concerned to apply moral standards to social problems, who seek social action without socialism, open or hidden.

Under Editor Greenfield's leadership and against the background of convictions stated in his "Confession" in this issue, we believe Faith and Freedom will be more than ever dedicated to the Christian libertarian point of view. This view is based on profound faith in God, the Author of liberty, and in Jesus Christ, who promoted persuasion in place of coercion as the means for accomplishing positive good, and whose emphasis was always upon the primacy and dignity of the individual as the starting point for relationships of creative communion with one another and with God.

Spiritual Mobilization's credo remains unchanged: that man, being created as a child of God, has certain inalienable rights and attendant responsibilities; that these rights and responsibilities must not be coercively usurped; and that the conscience of the church and of the community must be informed and aroused against every oppressive force that denies these rights, and against every sedutive voice that would relieve men of personal moral responsibility.

To Readers of "Faith and Freedom"

We are eager to send our journal to as many as are willing to give it thoughtful attention. If you feel that your minister, your colleagues or friends should be receiving it, you can help by sending names and addresses with a covering contribution to Spiritual Mobilization, P. O. Box 877, San Jacinto, California.

Your Comments Invited

With our next issue we wish to begin a column of constructive reader comments. You are invited to write us, saying what you think, for or against, helping to create a better journal. Within the limits of space, we want to present comments on both sides of controversial matters. Letters must represent responsibility of thought, and should be signed.
MORAL STANDARDS AND UNION POWER

With humility, yet with firm recognition that men cannot escape the responsibility of making moral decisions in daily life, Spiritual Mobilization submits below a series of moral criteria in application to what it believes to be real and present dangers in organized labor. The statement that follows, while prepared in its original form by us, is the product of consultation with clergymen, businessmen, and members of labor unions. Readers are urged to subject it to the most thoughtful scrutiny and give us the benefit of further insight, whether favorable or unfavorable. Each of the points presented here will be more fully developed in an article, the first of which appears in this issue, and the rest of which will appear in future issues, of FAITH AND FREEDOM.

THE EDITOR

The long-standing avowed purposes of labor unions to secure "justice" in what they regard as a "fairer distribution" of the wealth produced by business and industry have appealed to many people as morally and religiously praiseworthy. Especially religious leaders, with their natural sympathy for the "underdog," have been led to champion the hopes and aspirations of the working man as represented by labor organizations. During the early years of the laboring man's struggle for recognition of what he regarded as his rights, there at least appeared to be considerable warrant for this lending of moral sanction on the part of many religious leaders and ecclesiastical organizations.

Whatever the merits of the union movement in its earlier stages, and the legitimacy of ecclesiastical support when the movement was still in struggling infancy, the vast power now in its hands, together with the appalling amount of corruption exposed by the Senate's Investigating Committee, point very clearly to the need for a new evaluation of organized labor. Attempts have been made by various ecclesiastical bodies, in the face of the embarrassing exposures of corruption, to meet the new situation by condemning such corruption, but stopping at this point and calling attention to comparable sins on the part of management and others.

It is not to be questioned that violations of moral and legal standards are to be found elsewhere than in labor unions, but to point to the sins of others as an extenuation of the sins of organized labor is to evade the real issues. Management has been under moral review for generations; it is time to bring organized labor under moral review just as seriously and vigorously.

It is time to recognize that what we have now to deal with is not the simple and unquestionable right of workers to organize and bargain collectively, but what has many of the appearances of a conspiracy disguised by the legitimate claims and worthy purposes of laboring people. What seems to be developing is a use of the labor union movement by a number of irresponsible leaders in ways which, if unchallenged and uncorrected, can bring not only rank and file workingmen and their employers, but even our entire society under collectivistic control. It is this misuse of union power that has brought discredit upon and obscured and corrupted what is good and right in the organizations of labor.
Accordingly, the following criteria, based upon unimpeachable standards derived from the Judeo-Christian tradition, are submitted for the thoughtful consideration of all who are concerned for justice and freedom.

I. PERSUASION VS. COERCION AND VIOLENCE

Whereas the Christian principle has always been persuasion by love, reason and example rather than force, with the possible (sometimes debated) exception of the emergency of self-defense, the union movement must be judged first according to its resort to coercion and violence. At this point the frequent use of force by labor unions to secure their demands cannot fail to be noticed, though it must be further recognized that coercion is often hidden as an implicit threat, to be used only if considered "necessary." The strike weapon enjoys the sanction of both law and current morality, not to speak of the moral approval of many religious leaders. Together with the "right to strike," however, organized labor also enjoys the moral and legal immunities of a "double standard" which winks at violence and intimidation when these erupt in times of strike. While the right to refuse to work, as an individual or an organized group, is not seriously called into question, the prevailing pattern of preventing others from working, frequently by the use of vilification, intimidation, and violence against those who wish to continue work, must be called under the severest moral indictment. The use of violence in times of strike has too many resemblances to war.

II. VOLUNTARY VS. COMPULSORY UNION MEMBERSHIP

Whereas the Christian principle has always been that of voluntary association and brotherhood, and whereas this principle, under the Constitution of the United States, has imposed limits upon the coercive power of even the government, organized labor must be judged according to its insistence upon compulsory membership, which is no more than another case of coercion, applied specifically to workers. All the arguments in favor of compulsory membership must fall before the ultimate principle of freedom of choice. Only government, by the conditions of citizenship, has the prerogative of compulsory obedience to its laws. To permit or delegate this prerogative to a private organization is to undermine the sovereignty of the state and to deprive individuals of their God-given right to choose. Indeed, government itself must respect a high degree of freedom of choice lest it become tyrannical. Organized labor, insofar as it prevents the freedom of association, which inherently carries with it the freedom of non-association, must be subjected to the most serious of moral judgments.

III. EQUAL RIGHTS VS. POLITICAL PRIVILEGE

Whereas the Christian principle has always been concern for the rights and liberties of all, and whereas this principle has been incorporated into the American system of balanced powers to try to prevent domination of any one group or individual by another, the union labor movement must be judged ac-

"The extent to which criminal, corrupt, and disreputable elements have infiltrated and now dominate the labor movement in some areas is shocking to an alarming degree. The impositions on management and the public, and the exploitation of union members in some labor organizations by arrogant and dishonest labor officials, have reached proportions that violate all proper ethics and standards of common decency, defy law and order, and constitute a serious threat to free trade unionism and our free enterprise system. Unless these vicious practices are stopped, there is real danger ultimately of a racketeer, gangster-dominated economy in our country."

Senator John L. McClellan. See also the McClellan articles in THE SATURDAY EVENING POST, May 3 and 10, 1958
According to its deliberate effort to add to the already existing legal immunities and political privileges highly partial to its special cause. For a quarter of a century organized labor has enjoyed legislation and court decisions aiding to disproportionate degree its position and power as over against industry and other segments of society. Seeing the advantage in governmental favoritism, labor leaders are currently engaged in extensive political activities, both to prevent limiting legislation and to secure a still more privileged position under law. While most certainly organized labor is entitled to its fair hearing before legislative bodies, its attempt to secure disproportionate power is augmented by the use of union funds, contributed in innumerable cases against the will of union members, for partisan political purposes. When businessmen and others have sought exploitive advantage gained by political action, moral and religious leadership has forthrightly and properly brought them under judgment. In having sought special political privilege at the expense of the community at large, and in continuing to seek it with funds provided by often unwilling members, in order to increase its power, organized labor also must be brought under moral judgment.

"You will get nothing in. We will close you up first if you don't sign up. We don't want a vote, we want a contract. I control Philadelphia. The union controls the country."

Bernard J. Marcus, organizing director, Teamsters Joint Council 53, reported in PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, December 20, 1956, by a manager of Quaker City Motor Parts Co.

IV. EQUAL LIBERTY VS. CONCENTRATED POWER

As a consequence of the privilege noted in the foregoing, and in the face of the same moral principle of equal rights and liberties for all, organized labor must also be judged according to its concentration of power. The frequently voiced charge of "labor monopoly" finds ample substance in several industries (such as the automotive, construction, mining, transportation, steel, and even music) in which an individual worker has virtually no opportunity for employment unless he belongs to one or another of the monolithic unions concerned. The industries themselves are virtually powerless to resist union demands. The extent to which the power of organized labor would be further concentrated if union membership became universally extended under present policy, philosophy, and law, is no less than frightening. The power to paralyze our entire economy that resides, for example, in the Teamsters' Union alone is enough to suggest the possibility of a union-dominated economy and government. Neither Christian nor democratic concern can view this growing concentration of power with equanimity.

The Fruits of The Tree

These first four considerations are basic. Any attempt to bring responsibility, justice, and freedom into the ranks of organized labor cannot hope to be fruitful unless the evils brought under judgment at these four points are corrected. It is these that feed and are fed by the further evils which are detailed hereafter; it is these four which are capable of being corrected by appropriate legislation or by the vigorous, honest, and fearless enforcement of laws already existing.

The remaining evils to be cited for moral evaluation, however, are equally important. They may not be so amenable to correction by law, except in special instances; but once the applicable moral principles are understood and the elements of coercion, compulsory membership, special privilege and monopoly are removed, they are open to correction by conscience within the ranks of labor itself and in cooperation with both management and the larger community. We proceed, therefore, to the fruits of the foregoing evils.

V. VIOLATION OF HUMAN DIGNITY

One of the foremost of Christian principles is the concern for human dignity -- respect for the individual personality and for the sanctity of our brotherhood with all men, regardless of class, caste, or creed. Despite claims to the contrary, many union leaders and members have shown a marked disregard for either human dignity in general, individuals in particular, or the spiritual bonds which alone can hold men in brotherhood with one another. This is evident not only in the use of compulsion in securing union membership, and in the use of both abusive language and violence against individuals who for good reason do not conform to the union pattern in times of strike; it is evident also in such widespread practices as "feather-bedding," rigid seniority systems, the rejection of incentive programs, and the fomenting of class warfare. It is an affront to human dignity to require that a man work at only a fraction of his capacity, to reward him according to his standing on the seniority scale irrespective of his ability, and to deny him the opportunity for superior earnings for superior work. Such practices reduce the individual to the role of a cog in a machine, in which individuality and ability, hence the sense of integrity and of being in responsible and responsive relationship to the total industrial effort, are cut to a common, collective pattern. This has every resemblance to socialistic leveling, and as such must be brought to Christian judgment.

VI. ABANDONMENT OF MERIT

The foregoing leads to consideration of the growing disregard for the relationships of reward to production. Christian principle, at least as applied to the realm of material concern, has usually recognized the factor of merit in determining material reward. What is taken out of an economy must bear some correlation with what is contributed to the economy in the investment of time, energy, creative ability, or money, whether by an individual or a group. The disregard of this correlation, however difficult it may be to determine, is one of the major contributing factors in the disturbing wage-price spiral and recurring unemployment. When organized labor, fortified by its coercive power, demands wages and benefits beyond its fair share as determined by the principles of a free market, it is trying to squeeze out of an economy more than it puts in, and thus invites economic, political and moral disaster.

Organized labor has often asserted (whether correctly or incorrectly is not the present concern) that the financial return to the owners of industry is out of proportion to their contribution to society. But union labor's answer in terms of forcibly expropriating the wealth is worse than a simple "Robin Hood" philosophy of "robbing the rich to feed the poor" (though bad enough on that score alone); it is also the surest device for drying up the very investment capital by which employment is created. Yet the pressure for higher wages often continues without regard for economic realities, and organized labor is in a position to wreck an industry that resists its demands, no matter how unrealistic, and, in the process, destroy also the livelihood of its own membership and of an entire community. This is not speculation; it has happened! The power of exploitation has passed into the hands of union leadership in such marked degree that a moral judgment is inescapable. "Thou shalt not steal" is still a viable moral principle, no matter how disguised or to whom applied.

VII. DISREGARD FOR THE COMMUNITY

This last observation brings to attention a further violation of morals closely related to it. Whereas once again the Christian principle has always been concern for the rights and liberties of all,

"For anyone who is interested in where America is heading, and who wonders how he might be working ten or twenty years from now, it would be a good idea to keep an eye on Walter Reuther. Wherever we are going, like it or not, Walter Reuther is helping to push us there. As a matter of fact, if he isn't already, he just may be your boss some day."

Robert Crichton, article In ARGOSY, February, 1958
the demands of many labor unions for wages, benefits, and prerogatives for themselves, to the exclusion of concern for the remainder of the community, must be brought under judgment. No one questions the desirability of high wages and other forms of economic security, but when a segment of society, aided by political privilege and monopolistic power, seeks such benefits for itself alone, a grave inequity is imposed by the very organization which claims that its primary purpose is economic justice. The inflationary demands of organized labor which work hardship upon those -- especially the elderly and retired -- who have little or no means of increasing income must also be subjected to moral judgment. A further lack of concern for the community at large must be observed in times of many strikes, especially of the noneconomic and often "wildcat" variety, for which economic benefit is not even anticipated. These nevertheless paralyze, or at least impair, the production of wealth for both the local community and those parts of the economy elsewhere which are dependent upon the struck industry. It must be recognized that such strikes are not merely against employers but often, in effect, have the character of class warfare against the entire community. Another practice by which the innocent are made to suffer is the secondary boycott.

VIII. THE COVETING OF CONTROL

Inasmuch as exploitation and coercive expropriation should always be under the moral condemnation of religious sensibilities, judgment must also be brought upon the undisguised purpose of some union leaders to seize at least joint control, if not total control, of the means of production without the financial and managerial responsibility that accompanies control. The similarity of this purpose to socialistic purposes is unmistakable; the belief of many union leaders in free enterprise extends only to letting someone else pay the bill in exchange for token ownership while unionized labor takes the profits. The only just ways for wage earners or their organizations to secure a share in the control of industry are to buy it, as do all other investors, or to earn it by merit and achievement. The purpose, to the degree in which it exists, of forcibly seizing a larger, if not total, share in the control of industry must come under judgment with all socialistic and communistic purposes, for they are so similar as to make any real difference more verbal than actual.

IX. DISTORTION OF TRUTH

Still another fundamental principle of Christian faith is integrity and scrupulous regard for truth. Truth may be distorted unwittingly and in ignorance, but the persistent and obviously deliberate betrayal of truth in their representations of economic realities, belligerent one-sidedness in labor-management disputes and political debates, together with quick resort to vilification of any who challenge or oppose them, must bring against the leadership forces in organized labor the serious charge of bearing false witness. The persistent evasions on the part of many union leaders in appealing to the Fifth Amendment during the Senate investigations of union racketeering are only a more obvious case in point. The methods by which many labor organizations have misrepresented economic doctrine, disguised their purposes, and sought to conceal or disavow vicious practices are less commonly recognized but far more serious falsifications. It is by these artful propaganda measures that leaders of organized labor have succeeded in deceiving the public in general and such specialized groups as the clergy in particular. Behind the deliberate deceit, wherever it appears, is the Machiavellian-Marxist philosophy, whether conscious or unconscious, that "the end justifies the means." For this cynical disregard of truth in pursuit of their ends, the guilty must uncompromisingly be brought to moral judgment.

X. BETRAYAL OF STEWARDSHIP

Finally, as Christian principle, under the concept of stewardship, has always placed high value upon integrity and responsibility in handling the lives, liberties, and properties of others, so a considerable segment of union leadership must be brought to stern judgment for betrayal of its stewardship. While the corruption exposed in organized labor has come under virtually universal condemnation, and is represented as the first and often only item of moral concern by many ecclesiastical leaders and bodies, it is here placed last as the consequence of the larger abuses in union polity, philosophy, and practice outlined in the preceding nine points. These other nine have been virtually ignored up to the present by many religious, labor, and political leaders. Corruption, in other words, has been too narrowly interpreted as graft or racketeering. Great coercive power, yoked to irresponsibility, the denial of freedom, and a false conception of justice and equality, cannot help breeding the obvious kind of corruption which has attracted public attention. But to condemn this kind of corruption alone is to strike at the symptom rather than the cause.

The Appeal Is To Conscience

We realize that the foregoing, sounding the note of judgment, is a somewhat negative approach to the problems presented. Implicit in every negative, however, is the positive, as judgment must always precede redemption. We feel that the prophetic trumpet of judgment must be sounded to rouse the moral and spiritual forces of America from the pecualiar and often dogmatic slumber that exists in regard to organized labor. We present these judgments, not from any prejudices against labor, but simply because we are for the dignity, prosperity, and freedom of all workingmen, regardless of economic status. We are concerned that the very organizations of labor which once seemed to men of good will to be the laborer's friend and hope can become his enemy and prison. We believe that the workers' right to organize and bargain collectively (as well as to bargain individually if they so desire) must be fully recognized and preserved, but not under the conditions of coercive, monopoly power that exist in many parts of organized labor today.

We repeat that some of the evils detailed above may require legal correction, while others are probably not amenable to political action. Our purpose, however, is not political but educational on the level of religion and morals. Our appeal is to conscience. Only an informed and roused conscience can effectively move to correct the excesses and abuses which threaten not only the individual workman but also our entire way of life as a free nation.

"More and more, the answers to labor's problems are political....I do not want our movement to be the tail of any party's political kite. I want it to be able to influence the political behavior of our parties. Our job will take us into the community agencies, into local and state politics, into social planning, into the bloodstream of American life."

James B. Carey, President, International Union of Electrical Workers, speech at Rutgers University, August 3, 1956.

Newsweek, May 12, 1958

"Hoodlums and other unsavory elements still ride high in close to one fifth of the American labor movement....The hoodlums are still feeding at the same troughs. Evidently they are above the law, above the power of all authority that might uproot them. And they have soured the reputation of the entire labor movement."

In the following article, the first of a series pursuant of the moral criteria for evaluating organized labor, the new editor proceeds from the personal experience which he narrated in the May, 1957, issue of FAITH AND FREEDOM. Providing new information about the much-publicized strike of 1956-57 in Princeton, Indiana, he proceeds with other evidence to an appraisal of labor coercion and violence.

I watched a Midwestern town live, or try to live, for four months in the paralysis of fear. I do not mean that people cowered and cried as they might at the point of a gun, though there was even some of that. As instance, I'll never forget the night that a man called, pleading that I summon the police for his protection. He had sent his wife and children away, while he sat in his darkened house with a rifle, watching suspicious cars cruise back and forth on the road. Nor will I forget the day that another man came, saying that he had to quit the struggle we were engaged in because his life had been threatened and his wife was in hysterics. These, of course, were men in the thick of the battle. They were what the union indelicately called "scabs" who dared to go back to work in the teeth of a wildcat strike.

The Reign of Fear

But I am not referring just to these who had it worst. Their story has been widely distributed under the titles, "The Anatomy of a Wildcat," "Dear Mom," and "The Moral Imperative of the Right to Work." I'm talking about the community as a whole....

About the night, for example, that I sat with a group of worried business men. They asked me to call off the resistance movement of the workers in the struck industry -- the industry that was the economic backbone of the town -- because their business establishments were being hurt. They were not saying that the resistance was morally wrong. They agreed that morally we were right; but what we were doing was futile. You can't fight the power of a union. Better to surrender and have peace again.

Or the night that several members of my church met at the invitation of three young men who were not afraid. I wasn't there; I was told of it afterward. The three young men asked the group to approve a statement assuring me of the moral support of my own congregation and telling the town where they stood. The group approved -- but they would not sign their names!

For they remembered what had happened to the business of one of their number. A member of a local union not related to the strike at all had placed a large order for equipment to use on the farm he operated as a sideline. He was told by fellow members of his union to cancel the order, or else expect trouble. Why? The head of the equipment firm was one of the handful of business men who had presumed to send telegrams to the International Headquarters of the striking union, condemning the strike as illegal and unwarranted, and urging that it be stopped.

The Terror Hidden

No, the terror did not always show where you could see it. Walking the streets by day, despite the terrorism that stalked by night, a casual visitor would believe, if he did not overhear huddled conversations, that things were normal in Princeton. Stores were still open, offices still operating, banks still doing business. He would not see the corner grocery store going broke giving credit to strikers and fearing to do otherwise. He would not see the difference between the bank being boycotted and the bank that held the union funds. He would not detect the studied indifference of the schoolteacher whose pupils represented the two factions in his classroom, or of the appliance shop whose customers were both for and against.

One had to live there to feel the undercurrents and know what they meant. There is no better mask for fear than courtesy and cultivated neutrality.

And yet, out of a town of ten thousand and a work force of six hundred and fifty in the union directly involved, the striking faction was never more than a hundred! It was no more than a hundred who nearly ruined an industry, kept four hundred fellow workers unemployed, used terrorism against those who dared to defy the picket line, and rendered the whole community impotent to fight back or even to voice an opinion!

At the time of the greatest fear, after the infant daughter of a young couple who defied the picket line had been shot through the head, I took occasion to say from my pulpit in a radio sermon: "Because of the one per cent of the people, ninety-nine per cent are being immobilized by fear, huddled like so many sheep waiting to be sheared: ... Think of it -- a tiny minority keeping the vast majority terrorized! That is how the dictators take over, not by converting people to their way of thinking, but by keeping them cowed. There is nothing in America so dangerous as a lot of good people who, when the good is challenged by an evil, sit tight and do nothing, thinking only of their own skins!"

Nothing Unique

The story of Princeton, Indiana, which has been told so many times in so many ways, could be multiplied by every violent strike that has ever occurred in any town in any corner of America. The Princeton story became national headline news only because a baby was shot. If the reign of fear in this community were isolated or unique, we could perhaps shrug it off as "one of those things that sometimes happens."

But it is not unique! It is only a single case in the first and most fundamental of the criteria by which organized labor must be brought to moral judgment: it's resort to coercion and violence.

"It would require several volumes to recount the stories of strike violence of even recent years."

Donald Richberg

I wish I could stop there. Violence, because it is overt, is obvious, and of course we don't like it. But the irony of the problem of organized labor is that, during a strike, violence is largely condoned. When the shooting of a baby in the Princeton battle roused an uncommon wave of emotional reaction, the International President of the Princeton Local issued the statement that his union "does not condone violence." Donald Richberg makes the point that 'unions always claim that they do not 'condone' violence.' Yet in the strike about which I can speak from personal familiarity, it had been going on for three months, including the shot-gunning of two other homes and the dynamiting of a third, before the public recoil at violence to a baby evoked the disclaimer by the International President.

A Double Standard

An editorial from the Indianapolis Star under the searing title "Whose Fault is Murder?" commented upon the crime and made the point that I am concerned to emphasize here. "There has been too much inclination in Indiana and elsewhere to regard vandalism, physical violence, and even gunplay as one thing when practiced in connection with a labor dispute, and another kind of crime entirely when no labor union is involved. There is no morality in the distinction. A baby's life, or an adult's, is as precious when a strike is under way as it is when a burglar enters the house.... The strikers at the plant are entitled to the law's protection, but so are those who refuse to strike. When the law becomes a one-way street to be traveled only by a select minority, that street leads to anarchy. And to murder:

"The lethargy that all too often grips peace officers called upon to investigate bombings, destruction of property, and gunfire in the night when a labor union is involved is as criminal as the acts themselves! Too many chiefs of police stay home when the labor goons are on the prowl. Too many solid citizens plead that it is none of their business. Too many politicians look the other way...."

The disturbing reality is that, under the political privilege and moral sanctions which organized labor has so long enjoyed, there is a "double standard" in regard to labor violence. It is somehow taken for granted that in labor disputes violence will occur and must be accepted, and therefore condoned, as it is accepted, condoned, and even glorified in military warfare.

It is the "second standard" of regarding strikes as a form of warfare, with most of the immunities and special dispensations of war, that gives to organized labor its particular and effective coercive power. If, as in war, "everything is fair" in the course of a strike just to make sure that the strike is won, all pretense at defending organized labor in terms of the right to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining must be abandoned. The acceptance of violence in a labor dispute as something other than a crime, no matter how often such violence is publicly disavowed by labor leaders or deplored by the lip service of public officials responsible for enforcing the laws against crime, has the clear implication that collective "bargaining" has become collective coercion.

Is Any Strike "Peaceful"?

This judgment is not changed when it is acknowledged that many strikes are "peaceful." It must be recognized that a strike, by its very nature, is always coercive, whether violent or not. It is coercive on two fronts: against the employer, and against the people who want to work in spite of the strike. Even when "peaceful," a strike is always implicitly and potentially violent, carrying with it the threat of a less scrupulous use of force if "peaceful" means prove ineffective. This implicit violence must be as fully recognized, and as fully condemned, as the overt and explicit.

In his Labor Union Monopoly, (1) the powerful indictment of present-day organized labor by a long-time friend and champion of labor, Donald Richberg makes this point emphatic and unmistakable. "It is highly questionable whether any long strike could be won by labor without the use of lawless methods of preventing a replacement of strikers or a steady drift of strikers back to work. Nowadays there is sure to be so much reasonableness in a large employer's efforts to prevent a strike, so much unreason in the ultimate labor demands, and so much individual hardship in striking, that a long strike would seldom be won if employees and would-be employees could peacefully accept offers of employment."

"That is why the foul shape of terrorism is always lurking in the shadows behind even apparently peaceful strikes. If any real effort is made by an employer to operate, and by willing workers to work despite a strike ban, then suddenly crude violence appears in support of the strike. Such violence is always hypocritically disavowed by strike leaders; but dynamiting, stench bombing, train-wrecking, cable-cutting, window-smashing, and physical assaults and intimidation of would-be workers and their families do not happen by coincidence as spontaneous outbursts of individual action."

Hidden Assumptions in "Right to Strike"

The defense of organized labor is often made that, nevertheless, labor must have the "right to strike," or else its bargaining with employers lacks power for "persuasion." The claim is made that if labor is not permitted to fortify its demands with coercive force, it is completely at the mercy of the employers.

I. EMPLOYERS ARE EVIL

The point has its merit, but it contains assumptions which need to be examined. It assumes, first of all, that employers as a group, with only a few exceptions, are grasping and greedy, and unresponsive except in the face of coercion. When it serves the purposes of labor leaders in motivating the organization of a union or the calling of a strike, the employer is almost invariably represented in union propaganda as the natural enemy of the laboring man -- the pitting of class against class. There are, unfortunately, enough employers of this stripe to give some substance to the claim.

But what is overlooked is that if an employer should be an approximation of the caricature which the propaganda of class struggle has so long made its stock-in-trade, no one is required to work for him. In the competitive market any employer who becomes unreasonable to work for will lose his employees to more attractive employment and be unable to stay in business. The very "greed" of an employer by which unions so frequently seek to justify their organization is the best guarantee that the workingman has of wages and conditions of work which will keep him a willing workman. The vast majority of employers have learned, often the hard way, that self-interest itself requires the utmost in fair dealing with employees as well as stockholders and consumers. The coercive use of the strike weapon on the assumption that most employers are impervious to the legitimate interests of labor is in reality increasingly difficult to defend.

II. UNIONS ARE THE BENEFACtor

A second assumption that needs to be examined is that organized labor is responsible for the vast increase in the laboring man's income and other perquisites. If it were not for the power of the strike weapon in the hands of the unions, it is claimed, the worker's scale of living would be woefully depressed. This piece of fiction has been so long and widely accepted that a future issue of Faith and Freedom will have to be devoted to it in greater detail. Perhaps the most authoritative answer to this illusion is F. A. Harper's searching analysis, Why Wages Rise. But the sum of the answer seems to be that the real source of higher wages and benefits is profits, and profits depend upon production. It is the increase of production per man-hour, due not to unions as such but to efficient, mass-producing machinery, labor-saving devices, and mass media of selling, these in turn making it profitable for employers to invest in still greater production facilities and creating still higher employment and wage scales, that have been the primary factors in the improvement of the laborer's standard of living.

Whatever the rank and file workman may owe to the union organizer, he owes far more to the inventor, the engineer, the salesman, the management, and the investing ownership of business and industry. In many respects the labor leader who organizes a union is a parasite upon the productive capacity of both American capital and labor, who, working together, have produced a plum for the labor leader's plucking. When members of a union are induced to strike, they are often, therefore, using coercion to extort from the productive process more than they themselves have put in. To extort this "more" is to increase the cost of production, and therefore of commodities, to a degree that cancels out most if not all of the gain, not to speak of the cost in lost wages to the strikers themselves.

III. NO ONE MAY WORK

But there is a third assumption in the so-called "right to strike" that needs to be examined -- this one on purely moral grounds. Few people, other than outright Communists, question the right of workers, individually or collectively, to quit their jobs if they do not like the wages or conditions of their work. But their right forcibly to prevent others who are satisfied and willing to work from continuing their employment, or new workers from taking their places, must emphatically be called into question.

The fact that strikers want to retain their jobs while nevertheless refusing to work is tacit admission that they are not so dissatisfied that they are ready to seek employment elsewhere. The very terms of the average strike are in themselves a form of backhanded tribute to the employers; and the desire for "more" is a witness to the fact that if greed is to be considered a factor, it is not a vice of employers alone.

But to compel those who either need or want to stay at their jobs to discontinue work along with those who want to strike, is to be guilty of the most glaring of immoralities. To adapt an analogy used by Professor Edward Chamberlin of Harvard, (3) if one of two maids working in a private home is dissatisfied with her employer or her wages, she will usually quit, and the mistress of the house proceeds to find a new maid, or at least to try to get along with the other one alone. But if, in quitting, the first maid contends that the mistress is not permitted to keep the other maid working or to hire a new one, and that, if she tries, both the mistress and the other maids are subject to violence, the injustice involved is immediately apparent.

Yet this is precisely what happens on a larger scale when the dissatisfied workers in a struck industry threaten force to make sure that no one is permitted to work or to take over the strikers' jobs! Anyone who tries to go to work is called a "scab" or a "strikebreaker," and the evidence from the vast majority of strikes in recent years is that it is the "scabs," their own fellow workers and union members, who suffer most of the abuse, intimidation, and violence attendant upon strikes. And this in the organization that professes to promote "brotherhood"!

The verdict seems inescapable. In the light of the Christian principle of persuasion by love, reason, and example, the almost constant resort of organized labor to coercion and hidden or overt violence must be brought under the most uncompromising of moral judgments. To dignify collective coercion by calling it "collective bargaining" is to vitiate not only the whole spirit of Christianity but the dignity of labor as well. If coercion and violence are to continue as the techniques for pressing the demands of labor, only moral blindness can give it the sanctions of religion. Only the unjust live by force.

"The grim fact is that in recent years there has grown up among us a new form of slavery -- insidious, semisecret, and sinister. Today's captives are those rank-and-file union members who have fallen in helpless thrall to crooks and gangsters disguised under the title of 'labor leaders' or 'employer representatives'. . . . I estimate that those now in bondage must number more than 1,000,000. Some put the figure as high as 4,000,000 -- which happens to approximate the number of American slaves in 1860."

Senator McClellan, SATURDAY EVENING POST article, May 3, 1958

"We are warning you (labor leaders) now, and we are warning all in the future: DO NOT DIFFER WITH THE MOVEMENT WITH RESPECT TO ISSUES OR CANDIDATES. WE WILL NOT STAND FOR IT."

CONFESSION OF CONCERN
BY THE EDITOR

It would be presumptuous to speak autobiographically for any purposes of vanity. Except to draw from experiences to illustrate the issues with which we in Spiritual Mobilization seek to deal, I had preferred to keep myself in the background. Yet the disposition and conditioning of an editor, however objective he tries to be, must color what he writes and publishes; and because readers have a right to know the biases and idiosyncrasies of the man who asks their indulgence, I have been urged to provide, not a "story of my life," but a summary of my intellectual and spiritual pilgrimage.

There is no need to contour the valleys and heights, or map the rough and smooth roads, which characterize the landscape of any man's career. Let it be sufficient to say that I have learned what I have learned by both bad decisions and good decisions, by both folly and fortune, by the trial and error through which a man often learns the hard way as well as by the grace of God.

My boyhood years, beginning forty-five years ago, were spent in the forests and wide-open spaces outside Seattle, Washington, under primitive conditions comparable to those of the nineteenth century pioneers. My parents, as newcomers from Sweden, were of that sturdy, devout, and self-sufficient stock which provided the character and strength of the earlier eras in American history. From them I learned to be an "inner-directed" individual who seldom felt and was only occasionally exposed to the conformist pressures which have become epidemic among the generation of my own children.

An Individualistic Socialist

Ironically, it was as an individualist that, in college, I became a near-socialist. Entering the State university in 1932, having to room and board (believe it or not) on less than $4.00 a week, with tuition only $25.00 a quarter, I was drawn into the minority group of rebels who just before the dawn of the Roosevelt Era were still unpopular. That crucial first year created the internal revolution that switched me from an uninform ed fundamentalism to an equally uninform ed "modernism" and social "liberalism" to which a number of young idealists were converted during those years of the "fundamentalist-modernist" controversy and the depths of the Great Depression. Upon transferring to another college, I continued on the religious and political "left," encountering little to challenge it and much to encourage it. As "liberalism" became increasingly the accepted pattern, I stayed with it throughout theological seminary, where I was steeped in the Social Gospel in its time of greatest political, intellectual, and ecclesiastical ascendancy.

It is familiarly, though not too accurately, said that "if you are not a socialist at twenty, you have no heart; but if you're a socialist at thirty, you have no money; and if a socialist at forty, you have no brains." In my mid-thirties, after ten years of preaching, teaching, and desultory foundering, I had no money, and had reached the dead end in my career as steered by my so-called "brains." But it was precisely at this dead end that I did some serious revaluing of the pattern of my life and the content of my thinking. It was at this point that I rediscovered the meaning of myself as an individual, and of God as the source of guidance and grace. Under the inspiration of a book, which enormously illumined the full implications of the social thinking to which I had been so long addicted, I came to reaffirm my boyhood heritage of individuality and independence, subject only to God, and started remaking my career. As a first step, after an absence of six years, spent mostly in graduate study and college teaching, I returned to the Christian ministry.

The Liberal Religious Vision

As a minister now, nearly ten years later, I continue to be theologically liberal, though deepened and chastened, I trust, by experience, greater maturity, and more searching understanding. Perhaps, because labels have become so ambiguous, I could designate my religious position with equal ambiguity as "middle-of-the-road." For research, thought, and experience have led to recovery from the conservatism of my boyhood such verities as prayer, belief in fundamental principles, and submission to the Divine Will, together with a growing comprehension of the teaching and meaning of Christ.

I have learned that, refined, modified, and adapted to one's own central vision, truth and insight are to be found in all traditions, and that none is to be despised simply because at other points we differ. I no longer quarrel with those who sincerely and intelligently hold to religious convictions different from my own. As much as the pages of Faith and Freedom may engage in controversial matters on the social front, these pages will never be used for gratuitous theological dispute. Spiritual Mobilization seeks to build its social constructs upon moral and spiritual insights derived from prophetic elements in the Judeo-Christian tradition common to both liberal and conservative.

And yet, let it be emphasized that theologically, at least as distinguished from neo-orthodoxy and fundamentalism, I am still essentially a liberal. I want this to be clear, for it is the theological liberals, for a long time I among them, who for the most part have been disposed toward the "liberalism" that is too often an honorific label put upon varying degrees and brands of socialism.

The Conservative Social Vision

For me, that kind of "liberalism" is past. On the social front I have become progressively more conservative, not because I have more money (because I haven't), but because, I hope, I do have a little more "brains" and considerably more "religion." And yet, while the acquisition of a more conservative social outlook is fairly normal with what is called "the mellowing of the years," I plead two special exceptions.

The first is that the conservative social point of view, which for want of a better word has been somewhat clumsily called "libertarianism," springs for me from my liberal theological orientation. It has become my firm conviction that liberal religious thinking, to be consistent, must lead into a philosophy of political, economic, and social freedom as the only valid foundation for justice. There is an emphasis here that needs to be made. There are numerous religious conservatives who hold to conservative social views, and I am grateful for their perspective. It needs to be shown, however, that a religious liberal, also, can be and ought to be socially conservative.

I happen to like the word "liberal." I like it because it was originally associated with the prophetic spirit of rebellion against the rigidities of orthodoxy in whatever areas of concern the rigidities are found. The prophet has always challenged the status quo. He seeks to inject flexibility into, and, if the resistance is too unyielding, he does not hesitate from the heights of eternal principle to bring thundering judgment upon, the patterns and molds by which a current civilization is being strait-jacketed and strangled. His primary passions are freedom and justice -- freedom that does justice not simply to the life of the flesh but especially to the mind and spirit -- as against the imprisoning ideologies, legalisms, and systems which, though often designed originally to liberate men, have hardened into chains for lack of continuing vision. "The spirit of the Lord is upon me," declared Jesus, recalling Isaiah,

"Because He has anointed me to preach good news to the poor, He has sent me to proclaim release to the captives, And recovering of sight to the blind;
To set at liberty those who are oppressed...." (1)

That is the authentic voice of the prophetic rebel, the true meaning of religious liberalism -- and social conservatism!

The New "Underdog"

This is why I have become a libertarian, meaning "to set at liberty," and this brings me to the second exception. The course of my social thinking has not been the familiar retreat into the "mellowness" of accepting a status quo because of prosperity, a desire to relax from younger battles, or a failure of nerve. In the middle years, I could settle back complacently with a reasonably acceptable achievement. Instead, I have become a libertarian with somewhat the same psychological motivation that I had twenty-five years ago as a near-socialist. The same prophetic idealism which made me a champion of the "underdog" then keeps me a champion of the "underdog" now.

Except that the meaning of "underdog" has to be redefined: No one becomes so much an "underdog" as anyone subjected to regimentation by organized power, whether in the hands of government, labor, or industry. The true "underdog" is anyone who is less than a free man. For his sake I was in my earlier years, under different and mistaken auspices, a crusader. After some barren years, I have recovered the "divine discontent" that Robert Lindner has called "the instinct of rebellion." I continue to be unblushingly an individualistic though responsible rebel -- a rebel with a cause!

The Christian Libertarian

And so, I claim the libertarian outlook -- if you wish, the "conservative-liberal" outlook -- as the vanguard of the prophetic movement of our era. It is "conservative" in its belief that eternal principles, proclaimed long ago by our Christian faith, must guide the course of free institutions and governments if these are to endure. Yet it is "liberal," too, in the sense of looking beyond the present to a freer, finer way of life in which the conserving principles are applied to the liberation of men from their present and hardening chains.

But because the words "conservative" and "liberal" have come to be so seriously misunderstood and ambiguously applied, I am happy to adopt the name of "Christian libertarian," clumsy as it may be, as the symbol of the prophetic spirit of freedom so desperately needed now. For me it is the contemporary meaning of restoring sight to the blind, and setting at liberty those who are oppressed.

$500 IN AWARDS
For Sermons on the Labor Question

Spiritual Mobilization, believing in the vital importance of Labor Day, and desiring to benefit from the moral and spiritual insights of clergymen on the labor question, offers awards totaling $500 for sermons or addresses delivered by clergymen of any faith at any time between August 30 and September 30, 1958. This wider spread of time recognizes that the concerns of Labor Day need not be confined to a calendar date.

Two awards of $100 each and six of $50 each will be given for addresses before any public gathering on the general theme of "Moral Standards and Labor Today."

A moral critique of organized labor is submitted in this Labor Day issue of Faith and Freedom. The awards are not offered for a parroting of this critique, but for the most constructive use of it. One award of $100, and six of $50, are for these sermons. The second award of $100 is for the address which most intelligently and effectively challenges our moral critique without violating the spirit of the theme, "Faith for Our Freedom," which appears inside the front cover.

Any clergymen wishing to take part should submit his manuscript in typewritten, mimeographed, or printed form, showing place and date of delivery. Entries may be submitted in behalf of the minister by interested laymen. Manuscripts should be mailed to Spiritual Mobilization, P.O. Box 877, San Jacinto, California, on or before October 20, 1958.

Entries will be evaluated by competent judges selected by Spiritual Mobilization. Awards will be made on the basis of clarity, comprehension of the subject, and the fairness and Christian spirit of the presentation. Spiritual Mobilization reserves the right to publish in whole or in part any prize-winning entry. All other manuscripts will be returned upon request if postage is provided.
